THE STORY OF CHANG K’IÉN, CHINA’S PIONEER IN WESTERN ASIA

TEXT AND TRANSLATION OF CHAPTER 123 OF SSĪ-MA TS’IÉN’S SHĪ-KI

FRIEDRICH HIRTH
PROFESSOR EMERITUS, COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

INTRODUCTION

The only complete translation of this Chinese text, which is as difficult as it is important, is the French version published by M. Brosset in the Nouveau Journal Asiatique (tome 2, Paris, 1828, p. 418-450) under the title ‘Relation du pays de Ta-ouan.’ Like Abel Rémusat’s works on cognate subjects, it was an undertaking of great merit and quite a revelation to the scientific world of its time, ninety years ago; but a comparison with the original Chinese text will convince Sinologues that a new translation, incorporating the greatly modified identifications and interpretations of later research, is an absolute necessity.

In Brosset’s translation, misconceptions of the author’s statements are unfortunately so frequent that readers anxious for correct historical or geographical information must be warned not to take facts for granted without a thorough scrutiny of the original. To illustrate the dangers besetting scholars unfamiliar with the spirit of the Chinese language, there is perhaps no more instructive example than the first sentence in § 12. There it is said of Chang K’ién, after his visit to Bactria, that, ‘having sojourned there fully a year, he returned, skirting the Nan-shan’ (cf. § 61: ‘all along the Nan-shan’). Not grasping the meaning of the character ping (Giles, no. 9282), which, according to Chang Shóu-ts’ié’s commentary of 737 A. D., is in this case to be read pang and has the sense of lién (Giles, no. 7109), ‘to connect, to adjoin,’ the very words of our pang Nan-shan passage being quoted in K’ang-hi (Rad. 117: 5, 12) from the Shī-ki as an example, M. Brosset translates: ‘Après un an de délai, revenant au mont Ping-nan,’ and adds in a footnote: ‘Montagne dans le Tibet.’ To guess the meaning of Chinese words from the mere sound of a transcription without having seen the Chinese characters themselves is a dangerous experiment. Under the sound ping, Giles's Dictionary has no less than twenty characters with as many, or more, different meanings; and about as many characters are found under the sound p'ing with the aspirated initial. Among the latter we find p'ing, 'a plain' (no. 9311). This had apparently induced Baron von Richthofen (China, 1. 449, 454) to reproduce Brosset's translation with an additional note saying that 'der Name Ping-nan zeigt, dass das Gebirge im Süden eines ebenen Landstrichs lag.' The Ts'ien-han-shu in its biography of Chang K'ien (chap. 61, p. 2) contains a parallel passage, rendered correctly by 'following the southern mountains' in Wylie's version ('Notes on the Western Regions,' in Journal of the Anthrop. Institute of Great Britain and Ireland, vol. 10, Feb. 10, 1880, p. 67).

Wylie's timely and highly meritorious contribution toward a much neglected field of study, however, also contains a great many mistranslations, and should in important cases never be used without consulting the original Chinese text. Alexander Wylie, whose name, as Henry Howorth appropriately remarks (op. cit. 9. 53), 'is a household word wherever the study of China and its borders is prosecuted,' had been afflicted with a serious breakdown in health, ending in total blindness, just at the time when he yielded to Howorth's persuasion to take in hand his translation from the Ts'ien-han-shu for the Anthropological Institute. On the whole his work gives a fair idea of the subject; but a revision of it will, sooner or later, have to be undertaken.

It is necessary to use the greatest caution in consulting the late T. W. Kingsmill's paper, first published in the Journal of the China Branch of the R. A. S., new ser. 14. 1-29, under the title 'The Intercourse of China with Central and Western Asia in the 2d Century B. C.,' and reprinted in JRAS, new ser. 14. 74-104, under the title 'The Intercourse of China with Eastern Turkestan and the Adjacent Countries.'

I have prepared the present new translation primarily in order to get a clear idea of the material which will have to serve as an introduction to renewed studies required for a second edition of my book China and the Roman Orient, published in 1885; and I now place it before students of Oriental history and Chinese literature with the hope that they may improve my rendering and interpretation by their criticisms. Of Professor Édouard Chavannes' gigantic work, the translation of the Shi-ki (Les Mémoires historiques de Se-ma Ts'ien traduits et annotés, Paris, Leroux, tomes i-5, 1895-1905), only five volumes have appeared, carrying us to Ssî-ma Ts'ien's chapter 47; and some considerable time may elapse before the publication of chapter 123 (cf. Chavannes' Synoptic Table of chapters in the Shi-ki and the T'ung-kién-kang-mu, vol. 1, pages ccxliv-ccxlix of his Introduction). In the meantime I would refer readers to this scholar's admirable critical essay on the Chinese historian's work, in his Introduction, pages i-ccxlix. It will be seen from Chavannes that we are not able to fix the exact year of the death of Ssî-ma Ts'ien; but, in all probability, the great work which has earned for him the title of 'the Herodotus of China' must have been completed about the year 99 B.C. (p. xlv), perhaps even a few years later, to give him time for the despatch of ten embassies to the Far West after the appointment, in 100 B.C., of Ch'an-föng as King of Ta-yüan. His father, Ssî-ma T'an, who, like himself, held the post of court astrologer, and who, besides having conceived the plan of writing the Shi-ki, may be responsible for certain portions of that work, had died in 110 B.C. (p. xxxiv, note). It follows, therefore, that he cannot have had any connection with that part of our Ta-yüan chapter which deals with facts lying beyond that date; and if Ssî-ma, the father, has been at all concerned in drafting portions of our text, his co-operation is not likely to have extended beyond its first half—say paragraphs 1 to 79 of the present translation—which I am inclined to look upon as being based chiefly on Chang K'ién's original report to the Emperor.

The Imperial Library of the Sui dynasty, to judge from its Catalogue (Sui-shu, chap. 33, p. 23 B), contained a book in one chapter entitled Chang-k'ién-ch'u-kuan-ch'i, i.e. 'Account of Chang K'ién's Expeditions Abroad,' which has apparently not been handed down to later periods, since it is not mentioned in the Catalogues of the T'ang and Sung dynasties, though Chang Tsung-yüan, in his Sui-king-tsi-ch'i-k'aŭ-ch'öng, chap. 6, p. 46, says that the title is quoted in the chapter on foreign coins in Hung Tsun's work, the Ts'üan-ch'i, published in 1149 A.D. But this may be a secondhand quotation. I place greater confidence in a reference to it in the Ku-kin-chu (chap. 3, p. 3), where the grape is referred to as having been introduced into China by Chang K’iê̂n. From what the critics in the great Catalogue of the Imperial Library of Peking (Tsung-mu, 118, p. 4) say in connection with an analysis of the Ku-kin-chu text, this paragraph must have been written during the Tsin dynasty, about 300 B.C., when Tsui Pau, the compiler of the older and original text now known as the Ku-kin-chu, apparently preferred the Chang-k’iê̂n-ch’u-kuan-chi to the Shi-ki as an authority. Since no author’s name is mentioned in connection with the title, this chi, or memoir, may go back to Chang K’iê̂n’s own Report. It is, however, not quoted in the Tsi-min-yau-shu (about 500 B.C.; see my notice of it in T’oung Pao, 6. 436-440, and Bretschneider, Botanicon Sinicum, 1. 77 ff.), where a number of foreign plants not referred to in our Shi-ki account, such as the pomegranate (t’u-lin = Ind. darim), sesamum orientale, garlic, and coriandrum sativum, are distinctly stated to have been introduced into China by Chang K’iê̂n. These and other cultural wanderings are quoted from various older works, partly lost. Altogether Chinese literature throws considerable light on such subjects as have been treated for Europe in Hehn’s Kulturpflanzen und Hausthiere. A great many plants and animals were brought to China, either by Chang K’iê̂n himself or by later expeditions sent by Wu-ti and his successors. Of these, certain breeds of the horse, also the vine and the lucerne, are the only ones referred to in the Shi-ki. Nevertheless, the one hero who must be looked upon as the pioneer of all that came from the West was Chang K’iê̂n, whose return to China in 126 B.C. opened a new epoch in the development of Chinese civilization. Another work which, I am led to believe from Bretschneider’s Botanicon Sinicum (1. 25), was at some time or other ascribed to Chang K’iê̂n himself, is the Hai-wai-i-wu-ki, i.e. ‘Record of Remarkable Things beyond the Seas.’ The title does not, however, seem very descriptive of the account of an overland expedition like Chang K’iê̂n’s.

I have in the present translation and in the accompanying Index rendered the several geographical terms occurring in the Chinese text by their Western equivalents, as accepted by most present-day Sinologues, without entering upon the arguments which have in the course of a century brought about so many

The Chinese text reproduced is that of the K’ien-lung edition of 1739. It has been compared with the original by Mr. T. Y. Leo, late Secretary of the Chinese Legation in Washington, D. C., a son of Liu Si-hung, the first Chinese envoy appointed to Germany (Giles, Chinese Biogr. Dict., no. 1299), and one of the few native scholars taking real interest in Western research in Chinese literature, to whom I am also indebted for many valuable suggestions in connection with my translation.

TRANSLATION*

(1) Our first knowledge of Ta-yüan [Ferghana] dates from Chang K’ién. (2) Chang K’ién was a native of Han-chung [in the south of Shen-si province]; during the period of K’ién-yüan [140-134 B. C.] he was a lang [a titular officer of the imperial household; a yeoman]. (3) At that time the Son of Heaven made inquiries among those Hiung-nu who had surrendered [as prisoners] and they all reported that the Hiung-nu had overcome the king of the Yüé-chü and made a drinking-vessel out of his skull. The Yüé-chü had decamped and were hiding somewhere, all the time scheming how to take revenge on the Hiung-nu, but had no ally to join them in striking a blow. (4) The Chinese, wishing to declare war on and wipe out the Tartars, upon hearing this report, desired to communicate with the Yüé-chü; but, the road having to pass through the territory of the Hiung-nu, the Emperor sought out men whom he could send. Chang K’ién, being a lang [cf. § 2], responded to the call and enlisted in a mission to the Yüé-chü; he took with him one

Kan Fu, a Tartar, formerly a slave of the T’ang-i family, and set out from Lung-si [Kan-su], crossing the territory of the Hiung-nu. (5) The Hiung-nu made him a prisoner and sent him to the Shan-yü [Great Khan, or King], who detained him, saying: ‘The Yüé-chi are to the north of us; how can China send ambassadors to them? If I wished to send ambassadors to Yüé [Kiangsi and Ch’okiang], would China be willing to submit to us?’ He held Chang K’ién for more than ten years, and gave him a wife, by whom he had a son. (6) All this time Chang K’ién had kept possession of the Emperor’s token of authority, and, when in the course of time he was allowed greater liberty, he, watching his opportunity, succeeded in making his escape with his men in the direction of the Yüé-chi. (7) Having marched several tens of days to the west, he arrived in Ta-yüan. The people of this country, having heard of the wealth and fertility of China, had tried in vain to communicate with it. (8) When, therefore, they saw Chang K’ién, they asked joyfully: ‘Where do you wish to go?’ Chang K’ién replied: ‘I was sent by [the Emperor of] China to the Yüé-chi, and was made prisoner by the Hiung-nu. I have now escaped them and would ask that your king have some one conduct me to the country of the Yüé-chi; and if I should succeed in reaching that country, on my return to China, my king will reward yours with untold treasures. (9) The Ta-yüan believed his account and gave him safe-conduct on postal roads to K’ang-kü [Soghdiana], and K’ang-kü sent him on to the Ta-yüé-chi. (10) The king of the Ta-yüé-chi having been killed by the Hu [‘Tartars’; in this case the Hiung-nu], the people had set up the crown prince in his stead [in the Ts’ièn-han-shu it is the queen who is appointed his successor]. They had since conquered Ta-hia [Bactria] and occupied that country. The latter being rich and fertile and little troubled with robbers, they had determined to enjoy a peaceful life; moreover, since they considered themselves too far away from China, they had no longer the intention to take revenge on the Hu [Hiung-nu]. (11) Chang K’ién went through the country of the Yüé-chi to Ta-hia [Bactria], yet, after all, he did not carry his point with the Yüé-chi. (12) After having remained there fully a year, he returned, skirting the Nan-shan. He wished to return through the country of the K’iang [Tangutans], but was again made a prisoner by the Hiung-nu, who detained him for more than a year, when the Shan-yü died and the ‘left’ Luk-li [possibly Turk. Ulugla, ‘highly honored’] prince attacked the rightful heir and usurped the throne, thus throwing the country into a state of confusion. At this time Chang K’ién, with his Tartar wife and T’ang-i Fu [i. e. Kan Fu, see above, § 4], escaped and returned to China.

(13) [The Emperor of] China appointed Chang K’ién a T’ai-chung-ta-fu [‘Imperial Chamberlain’] and gave T’ang-i Fu the title Fōng-shī-kūn [‘The Gentleman attending the Embassy’].

(14) Chang K’ién was a man of strong physique, magnanimous and trustful, and popular with the foreign tribes in the south and west. (15) T’ang-i Fu was formerly a Hu [Tartar; Hiung-nu]. Being an excellent bowman, he would, when supplies were exhausted, provide food by shooting game. (16) When Chang K’ién started on his journey, his caravan consisted of more than a hundred men; thirteen years later, only two lived to return. (17) The following countries were visited by Chang K’ién in person: Ta-yüan [Ferghana], Ta-yüé-chí [Indoscythians], Ta-hia [Bactria], and K’ang-kü [Soghdiana]; there were besides, five or six other large adjacent countries concerning which he gained information and on which he reported to the Emperor in the following terms.

(18) Ta-yüan [Ferghana] is to the southwest of the Hiung-nu and due west of China, at a distance of about 10,000 li. (19) The people are permanent dwellers and given to agriculture; and in their fields they grow rice and wheat. They have wine made of grapes (p’u-t’au) and many good horses. The horses sweat blood and come from the stock of the tién-ma [heavenly horse, perhaps the wild horse]. (20) They have walled cities and houses; the large and small cities belonging to them, fully seventy in number, contain an aggregate population of several hundreds of thousands. (21) Their arms consist of bows and halberds, and they shoot arrows while on horseback. (22) North of this country is K’ang-kü [Soghdiana]; in the west are the Ta-yüé-chí; in the southwest is Ta-hia [Bactria]; in the northeast are the Wu-sun; and in the east Han-mi and Yü-tién [Khotan]. (23) All the rivers west of Yü-tién flow in a westerly direction and feed the Western Sea; all the rivers east of it flow east and feed the Salt Lake [Lopnor]. The Salt Lake flows underground. To the south of it [Yü-tién] is the source from which the Ho [the Yellow River] arises. The country contains much jadestone.
The river flows through China; and the towns of Lóu-lan and Ku-shï with their city walls closely border on the Salt Lake. The Salt Lake is possibly 5000 里 distant from Chang-an. (24) The right [i. e. western] part of the Hiung-nu live to the east of the Salt Lake as far as the great wall in Lung-si. To the south they are bounded by the K’iüang [Tangutans], where they bar the road [to China].

(25) Wu-sun may be 2000 里 northeast of Ta-yüan; its people are nomads [following their flocks of cattle], and have the same customs as the Hiung-nu. Of archers they have several tens of thousands, all daring warriors. (26) Formerly they were subject to the Hiung-nu, but they became so strong that, while maintaining nominal vassalage, they refused to attend the meetings of the court.

(27) K’ang-kü [Soghdiana] is to the northwest of Ta-yüan, perhaps 2000 里 distant. It also is a country of nomads with manners and customs very much the same as those of the Yüé-chi. They have eighty or ninety thousand archers. The country is coterminous with Ta-yüan. It is small. In the south it is under the political influence of the Yüé-chi; in the east, under that of the Hiung-nu.

(28) An-ts’ai [Aorsi] lies to the northwest of K’ang-kü, perhaps at a distance of 2000 里. It is a nomad state, and its manners and customs are in the main identical with those of K’ang-kü. It has fully a hundred thousand archers. The country lies close to a great sea [ta-tsö, lit. ‘great marsh,’ the Palus Maeotis, i. e. the Sea of Azov] which has no limit, for it is the Northern Sea.

(29) The Ta-yüé-chi [Indocycythians] are perhaps two or three thousand 里 to the west of Ta-yüan. They live to the north of the K’uí-shui [Oxus]. South of them is Ta-hia [Bactria]; in the west is An-sì [Parthia]; in the north, K’ang-kü [Soghdiana]. They are a nomad nation, following their flocks and changing their abodes. Their customs are the same as those of the Hiung-nu. They may have from one to two hundred thousand archers. In olden times they relied on their strength, and thought lightly of the Hiung-nu; but when Mau-tun ascended the throne he attacked and defeated the Yüé-chi. Up to the time when Lau-shang, Shan-yü of the Hiung-nu, killed the king of the Yüé-chi and made a drinking vessel out of his skull, the Yüé-chî had lived between Tun-huang [now Sha-chóu] and the K‘i-lién [a hill southwest of Kan-chóu-fu], but when they were beaten by the Hiung-nu, they fled to a distant country and crossed to the west of Yüan [Ta-yüan], attacked Ta-hia [Bactria], and conquered it. Subsequently they had their capital in the north of the K‘ui-shui [Oxus] and made it the court of their king. The minority which were left behind and were not able to follow them, took refuge among the K’iang [Tangutans] of the Nan-shan, and were called Siau-Yüé-chî (Small Yüé-chî).

(30) An-sí [Parthia] may be several thousand li west of the Ta-yüé-chî. (31) The people live in fixed abodes and are given to agriculture; their fields yield rice and wheat; and they make wine of grapes. (32) Their cities and towns are like those of Ta-yüan. (33) Several hundred small and large cities belong to it. (34) The territory is several thousand li square; it is a very large country and is close to the K‘ui-shui [Oxus]. (35) Their market folk and merchants travel in carts and boats to the neighboring countries, perhaps several thousand li distant. (36) They make coins of silver; the coins resemble their king’s face. Upon the death of a king the coins are changed for others on which the new king’s face is represented. (37) They paint [rows of characters] running sideways on [stiff] leather, to serve as records. (38) West of this country is T’iau-chî; north, is An-ts’ai.

(39) Li-kan [Syria] and T’iau-chî [Chaldea] are several thousand li west of An-sí and close to the Western Sea. (40) It [referring to T’iau-chî] is hot and damp. (41) The inhabitants plow their fields, in which they grow rice. (42) There is a big bird with eggs like jars. (43) The number of its inhabitants is very large, and they have in many places their own petty chiefs; but An-sí [Parthia], while having added it to its dependencies, considers it a foreign country. (44) They have clever jugglers. (45) Although the old people in An-sí maintain the tradition that the Jo-shui and the Si-wang-mu are in T’iau-chî, they have not been seen there.

(46) Ta-hia [Bactria] is more than 2000 li to the southwest of Ta-yüan, on the south bank of the K‘ui-shui [Oxus]. (47) The people have fixed abodes and live in walled cities and regular houses like the people of Ta-yüan. (48) They have no great king or chief, but everywhere the cities and towns have their own petty chiefs. (49) While the people are shrewd traders, their soldiers are weak and afraid to fight, so that, when the Ta-yüé-chī migrated westward, they made war on the Ta-hia, who became subject to them. (50) The population of Ta-hia may amount to more than a million. (51) Their capital is called Lan-shī, and it has markets for the sale of all sorts of merchandise. (52) To the southeast of it is the country of Shōn-tu [India]. (53) Chang K'ién says [in his report to the Emperor]: 'When I was in Ta-hia, I saw there a stick of bamboo of Kiung [Kiung-chóu in Ssī-ch’uán] and some cloth of Shu [Ssī-ch’uán]. When I asked the inhabitants of Ta-hia how they had obtained possession of these, they replied: ‘The inhabitants of our country buy them in Shōn-tu [India].’ Shōn-tu may be several thousand lǐ to the southeast of Ta-hia. The people there have fixed abodes, and their customs are very much like those of Ta-hia; but the country is low, damp, and hot. The people ride on elephants to fight in battle. The country is close to a great river. According to my calculation, Ta-hia must be 12,000 lǐ distant from China and to the southwest of the latter. Now the country of Shōn-tu being several thousand lǐ to the southeast of Ta-hia, and the produce of Shu [Ssī-ch’uán] being found there, that country cannot be far from Shu. Suppose we send ambassadors to Ta-hia through the country of the K’iang [Tangutans], there is the danger that the K’iang will object; if we send them but slightly farther north, they will be captured by the Hiung-nu; but by going by way of Shu [Ssī-ch’uán] they may proceed direct and will be unmolested by robbers.'

(54) The Son of Heaven on hearing all this reasoned thus: Ta-yüan and the possessions of Ta-hia and An-si are large countries, full of rare things, with a population living in fixed abodes and given to occupations somewhat identical with those of the Chinese people, but with weak armies, and placing great value on the rich produce of China; in the north the possessions of the Ta-yüé-chī and K’ang-kūi, being of military strength, might be made subservient to the interests of the court by bribes and thus gained over by the mere force of persuasion. In this way a territory 10,000 lǐ in extent would be available for the spread among the four seas of Chinese superior civilization by communicating through many interpreters with the nations holding widely different customs. As a result the Son of Heaven was pleased to approve Chang K’i’en’s proposal. (55) He thereupon gave orders that, in accordance with Chang K’i’en’s suggestions, exploring expeditions be sent out from Kién-weî of the Shu kingdom [the present Sū-chóu-fu on the Upper Yangtzi] by four different routes at the same time: one to start by way of Mang; one by way of Jan [both names referring to Yangtzi] on the southwestern frontier; cf. Shi-ki, chap. 116, p. 2; one by way of Ssî [or Si]; and one by way of Kiung [Kiung-chóu in Ssî-ch’uan] and P’o [the present Ya-chóu]. (56) These several missions had each traveled but one or two thousand lì when those in the north were prevented from proceeding farther by the Ti and Tsō tribes, and those in the south by the Sui and K’un-ning tribes [placed by the commentators in the southwest of Sū-chóu-fu], who had no chiefs and, being given to robbery, would have killed or captured the Chinese envoys. (57) The result was that the expeditions could not proceed farther. They heard, however, that about a thousand lì or more to the west there was the ‘elephant-riding country’ called Tién-yüé [possibly meaning ‘the Tién,’ or Yünan, part of Yüé or South China], whither the traders of Shu [Ssî-ch’uan] were wont to proceed, exporting produce surreptitiously. Thus it was that by trying to find the road to Ta-hia [Bactria] the Chinese obtained their first knowledge of the Tién country (Yün-nan).

(58) The original idea to penetrate from China through the country of the southwestern barbarians was abandoned, because, in spite of the heavy expense incurred, the passage could not be effected; but it was in pursuance of Chang K’i’en’s report regarding the possibility of finding a road to Ta-hia [Bactria] that attention had again been drawn to these barbarians. It had been due to Chang K’i’en’s knowledge of their pasture-grounds, when following, in the capacity of a subcommander, the general-in-chief sent out against the Hiung-nu, that the army did not fall short of provisions. For this the Emperor invested him with the title ‘Marquis of Po-wang.’ This was in the year 123 B. c. (59) When, in the following year, Chang K’i’en took part in the Yu-pî-p’îng [about 80 miles east of Peking] campaign against the Hiung-nu in the capacity of a commander of the Guards under General Li [Li Kuang, according to Ts’ién-han-shu, chap. 61, p. 4] as commander-in-chief and the latter was blocked by the enemy with considerable losses to his army, Chang K’i-ien failed to come soon enough to the rescue. For this he was liable to the penalty of death; but, on payment of a ransom, his punishment was reduced to degradation to the rank of a private. (60) In the same year China sent the Piau-ki general (Ho K’ü-ping) to conquer the western ordu [capital] of the Hiung-nu. He took several tens of thousands [of troops] and pushed forward as far as the K’i-liên-shan [a hill in the south of the present Kan-chóu-fu]. (61) In the following year (121 B.C.) the Hun-shō prince with all his people tendered his allegiance to China, and in the west of Kin-ch’ōng [Lan-chóu-fu] and in Ho-si [in the west of Kan-su] all along the Nan-shan as far as the Salt Lake [the Lopnor] there remained no Hiung-nu. The Hiung-nu would from time to time come there to waylay travelers, but such visitations were of rare occurrence indeed, and two years later the Chinese forced their khan to retreat into the north of the desert. The Son of Heaven thereupon consulted Chang K’i-ien several times about Ta-hia and other countries, and since K’i-ien had lost his marquisate he submitted the following report:

(62) ‘When your servant was living among the Hiung-nu, he heard that the king of the Wu-sun was styled K’un-mo, and that the K’un-mo’s father was [chief of] a petty state on the western borders of the Hiung-nu. The Hiung-nu attacked and killed his father, and the K’un-mo, at his birth, was cast away in the wilderness, where meat was brought to him by a blackbird and a she-wolf nursed him with her milk. (63) The Shan-yü [khan of the Hiung-nu] regarded this as a wonder and, having raised the child to manhood, made him a military leader, in which capacity he distinguished himself on several occasions. (64) The Shan-yü restored to him the people of his father and made him governor of the western ordu [city, or fortified camp]. On receiving charge of his people, the K’un-mo attacked the neighboring small states with tens of thousands of bowmen, gained experience in warfare, and, after the Shan-yü’s death, withdrew his forces to a distant retreat, declining to appear at the court of the Hiung-nu. (65) The latter dispatched a force of picked troops to attack him, but, being unable to conquer him, regarded him as a spirit whom they had better keep at a distance and whom they would not seriously attack, though they con-continued to claim [nominal] jurisdiction of the Shan-yü over the K'un-mo. (66) Now the Shan-yü has recently been defeated by China, in consequence of which the Hun-shö prince's former territory has become deserted; and since the barbarians covet the rich products of China, this is an opportune time to bribe the Wu-sun with liberal presents, and to invite them to settle farther east in the old Hun-shö territory. Should they become attached to the Chinese as a brother nation by intermarriage, the situation would be in favor of their listening to our proposition, and if they do this, it would be tantamount to the cutting off of the right [i. e. western] arm of the Hiung-nu nation. Once we are connected with the Wu-sun, the countries to the west of them might be invited to come to us as outer subjects.'

(67) The Son of Heaven approved of Chang K’ién’s proposal and appointed him a commander in his bodyguard as well as leader of an expedition consisting of 300 men, each with two horses, and oxen and sheep in myriads. He also provided him with gifts of gold and silk stuffs worth millions, and with assistant envoys, holding credentials, whom he might send to and leave behind in other nearby countries. (68) When Chang K’ién arrived at Wu-sun, he keenly resented the humiliation offered to him, the ambassador of China, by a mere king of the Wu-sun, K’un-mo, in receiving him in audience with court ceremonial like that adopted with the Shan-yü of the Hiung-nu. Knowing the greed of these barbarians, he said: ‘If the king does not pay due respect to these gifts, which have come from the Son of Heaven, they will be withdrawn.’ The K’un-mo rose and offered obeisance before the gifts, but all other ceremonies passed off as of old. (69) Chang K’ién explained the Emperor’s ideas as follows: ‘If the Wu-sun are able to move eastward to the country of the Hun-shö, China will send a princess to become the K’un-mo’s consort.’ (70) The Wu-sun country was divided, for the King was old and, considering China very distant and being unaware of its greatness, had heretofore submitted to the Hiung-nu, and this for a long time indeed. Moreover, his own country was also nearer them, so that his ministers, who were afraid of the Tartars, did not wish to move away, and, since the king was not free to arrive at a decision of his own choice, Chang K’ién was unsuccessful in inducing him to adopt his suggestion.
(71) The K’un-mo had more than ten sons, the second of whom, called Ta-lu, was an energetic leader of the masses. In this capacity he set himself up in a separate part of the country with more than ten thousand horsemen. Ta-lu’s elder brother, the crownprince, had a son called the Ts’ön-ts’ü [according to Ts’ién-han-shu, chap. 96 B, p. 3, a title]. When the crownprince met with an early death, his last words to his father, the K’un-mo, were: ‘Let the Ts’ön-ts’ü become crownprince, and do not allow any other man to take his place.’ The K’un-mo, in his grief, consented; and so on the death of his father the Ts’ön-ts’ü became crownprince. Ta-lu was angry at being prevented from acting as crownprince and, having imprisoned his brothers, rose with his people in rebellion against the Ts’ön-ts’ü and the K’un-mo. The latter, being old, was in constant fear that Ta-lu might kill the Ts’ön-ts’ü; he therefore gave the latter more than ten thousand horsemen to settle elsewhere, while retaining the same number of horsemen for his own protection.

The population was thus divided into three parts; and, notwithstanding that the majority were under his authority, the K’un-mo did not dare to take it upon himself to conclude that treaty with Chang K’ién. (72) Chang K’ién, therefore, sent assistant ambassadors in several directions to the countries of Ta-yüan [Ferghana], K’ang-kü [Soghdiana], Ta-yüé-chi [Indoscythians], Ta-hia [Bactria], An-si [Parthia], Shön-tu [India], Yü-tién [Khotan], Han-mi [?] and the adjacent territories. (73) Wu-sun furnished guides and interpreters to accompany Chang K’ién on his return, and the latter, traveling with several dozen natives and as many horses sent by the people of Wu-sun in acknowledgment [of the Emperor’s gifts], thereby afforded them the opportunity to see China with their own eyes and thus to realize her extent and greatness. (74) On his return to China, Chang K’ién was appointed Ta-hing [‘Great Traveler,’ or head of the office of foreign affairs] with rank as one of the nine ministers of state. (75) More than a year after this he died.

(76) The envoys of Wu-sun, having seen that China was a very populous and wealthy country, reported to this effect on their return home, and this increased the estimation in which she was held there. (77) More than a year later, some of the envoys whom Chang K’ién had sent to the Ta-hia countries returned with natives of those countries, and after this the countries of the Northwest began to have intercourse with China. Since Chang K’ien had been the pioneer in such intercourse, envoys proceeding to the West after him always referred to the Marquis of Po-wang as an introduction in foreign countries, the mention of his name being regarded as a guaranty of good faith. (78) After the death of K’ien, the Hiung-nu heard of China’s relations with Wu-sun, at which they became angry and wished to make war on it. When China sent missions to Wu-sun, her ambassadors continually passed through the south of that country to Ta-yüan [Ferghana] and Ta-yüé-chī [Indescythians], and since the people of Wu-sun were afraid, they sent ambassadors and tribute horses, expressing their wish to bring about family relations by marriage with a Chinese imperial princess. The Son of Heaven consulted his ministers, who all said: ‘Let them first offer marriage gifts and we shall then send the maiden.’ (79) At first the Son of Heaven consulted an oracle in the ‘Book of Changes,’ which said that ‘the divine horse will come from the northwest.’ The horses received from Wu-sun were termed ‘heavenly horses,’ but when the ‘blood-sweating [han-hiüé] horses’ obtained from Ta-yüan [Ferghana] were found much stronger, the name ‘Wu-sun horses’ was changed to ‘[horses of the] extreme west,’ and the Ta-yüan horses were called ‘heavenly horses.’

At this time China began to build the great wall to the west of Ling-kii [near the present Liang-chóu-fu in Kan-su], and first established the district of Tsiu-ts’üan, through which one could reach the countries of the Northwest. Thus more embassies were despatched to An-si [Parthia], An-ts’ai [the Aorsi, or Alans], Li-kan [Syria under the Seleucids], T’iau-chī [Chaldea], and Shôn-tu [India], and as the Son of Heaven had such a fancy for the horses of Ta-yüan, ambassadors [sent to procure these horses] followed upon one another’s heels all along the route. Such missions would be attended by several hundred men, or by a hundred men, according to their importance. The gifts carried by them emulated in the main those sent in the time of the Marquis of Po-wang; but later on, when they had ceased to be a novelty, they were made on a smaller scale. As a rule, rather more than ten such missions went forward in the course of a year, and at the least five or six.
Those sent to distant countries would return home after eight or nine years, those to nearer ones, within a few years.

(80) This was the time when China had extinguished Yüé, in consequence of which the barbarians in the southwest of Shu (Ssi-ch’uan) became alarmed and asked that Chinese officers be appointed, and attended court. Thus were created the districts of I-chou, Yüé-sui, Tsang-ko, Shön-li, and Wön-shan, [the government] being guided by the wish that these territories should form a link in the development of the route to Ta-hia [Bactria].

(81) And so the envoys Pai Shi-ch’ang and Lü Yüé-jön were sent out in more than ten parties in a single year from these newly founded districts for Ta-hia [Bactria], but again and again they were held up by the K’un-ming tribes, who killed them and robbed them of the presents they carried, so that they were never able to reach Ta-hia. (82) Thereupon China raised an army from the convicts of the metropolitan district (san-fu; cf. Ts’ién-han-shu, chap. 76, p. 18, and other quotations in Pién-tei-lei-pién, chap. 91, p. 9 B) and sent the two generals Kuo Ch’ang and Weï Kuang in command of tens of thousands of soldiers of Pa and Shu [Ssi-ch’uan], to fight the K’un-mings who had intercepted the Chinese ambassadors, when several tens of thousands of the tribesmen were beheaded or made prisoners by the Chinese army before it withdrew. (83) After this ambassadors sent to the K’un-ming were again robbed, and a passage through this country was still found to be impracticable. (84) On the other hand, missions to Ta-hia [Bactria] by the northern route, via Tsiu-ts’üan, had by their frequency caused the foreign countries to be less and less interested in the Chinese ambassadorial gifts, which they no longer appreciated. (85) Since the work of the Marquis of Po-wang in preparing the way for intercourse with foreign countries had earned for him rank and position, officials and attendants who had accompanied him vied with one another in presenting to the throne memorials in which they discussed the wonders, advantages, and disadvantages of certain foreign countries; and when the memorialists asked to be nominated as envoys, the Son of Heaven, on account of the extreme distance of the countries to be visited and owing to the scarcity of men expressing a willingness to go, would comply with such requests and would even provide credentials to candidates for ambassadorial posts without asking any questions as to whence they had come. In order to encourage enterprise in this direction numbers of embassies were fitted out and sent forward, though among those who returned there were bound to be some who had either purloined the presents entrusted to them or failed to carry out the imperial instructions.

The Son of Heaven on account of the experience of these quasi-envoys, would merely investigate cases as being highly criminal and punishable in order to stir up a feeling of resentment. By causing them to atone for their guilt [by payments?] they were led to apply again for ambassadorial appointments. Chances for such appointments now becoming numerous, those concerned in them made light of infringements of the law, and the lower officials connected with them would also give exaggerated accounts of the conditions of the foreign countries in question. Those who reported on some great projects in connection with foreign countries would be given plenipotentiary posts, whereas reports on less important ones would be rewarded with mere assistant-ships, for which reason reckless and unprincipled men became eager to follow examples thus set. The ambassadors, being mostly sons of poor families, appropriated the gifts sent by the government, and would undersell them for their private benefit. Foreign countries, in their turn, got tired of the Chinese ambassadors, whose tales consisted of conflicting accounts.\textsuperscript{a} \textsuperscript{a} Mr. T. Y. Leo remarks in connection with the above sentence: ‘This is the interpretation by Fu K'ien [2d century A. D.]. According to Ju Shun [as quoted in a scholium to our passage] the passage would read: ‘The foreign countries in their turn got tired of the Chinese ambassadors, for many men [of the foreign countries] had complained that each had been more or less cheated and insulted several times by the Chinese.’ Judging by what follows, I am inclined to think the latter interpretation is the more logical. imagined that a Chinese army would not be near enough to reach them, and that they were free to annoy the Chinese ambassadors by cutting off their food supplies. The ambassadors were thus reduced to a state of starvation, and their exasperation took the form of actual hostilities. Lóu-lan and Ku-shī, which, though merely small countries, were thoroughfares to the West, attacked and robbed the Chinese ambassadors [Wang Kʻui and others] more than ever, and unexpected troops of the Hiung-nu would at all times intercept westbound envoys. Ambassadors would therefore strive to outvie one another in spreading reports of the calamities threatening China from those foreign countries, which had walled cities and towns, but whose armies were weak and could easily be vanquished.

(86) On this account the Son of Heaven sent the Tsung-piau marquis [Chau] Po-nu to lead some tens of thousands of cavalry of the feudal states and regular troops toward the Hiung-nu River, wishing to engage the Tartars, but the latter retreated without giving battle. (87) In the following year Po-nu attacked Ku-shī. He took the lead with more than seven hundred light cavalry, captured the king of Lóu-lan, and defeated Ku-shī. He then displayed the prestige of his army in order to ‘corner’ Wu-sun, Ta-yüan, and other countries. On his return, he was raised to the rank of a marquis of Tso-yé.³ (88) Wang Kʻui, who had been repeatedly ill-treated as an ambassador by Lóu-lan, had reported this to the Son of Heaven, who raised an army and ordered him to assist Po-nu in bringing Lóu-lan to terms. For this, Wang Kʻui was made Marquis of Hau.⁴ (89) A line of military stations was now established between Tsiu-tsʻüan and the Yü-mön Gate. (90) Wu-sun now presented a marriage gift of a thousand horses, upon which China sent a relative of the emperor’s, the Princess of Kiang-tu, as a consort for the king of the Wu-sun. The latter, the Kʻun-mo, appointed her his right [i. e. less-honored] consort. The Hiung-nu, on their part, also sent a daughter in marriage to the Kʻun-mo, who appointed her his left [i. e. most-honored] consort. The Kʻun-mo said ‘I am old,’ and he induced his grandson, the Tsʻön-tsʻü, to marry the [Chinese] princess.

The Story of Chang K’ien

(91) The Wu-sun had great store of horses; rich men had as many as four or five thousand each.

(92) Once, when a Chinese ambassador had come to An-si [Parthia], the king of that country caused twenty thousand horsemen to welcome him at the eastern frontier, which was several thousand li distant from the royal capital. When he reached the capital he found that he had passed some dozens of walled cities, densely populated. When the ambassador returned to China they, in their turn, sent envoys to accompany the mission back to China, in order that they might see China’s greatness with their own eyes. They offered as tribute big birds’ eggs [ostrich eggs] and jugglers from Li-kan [Syria, etc.]. And the small countries to the west of Yüan, namely Huan, Ts’iën, and Ta-i [?], and those to the east of Yüan, namely, Ku-shi, Han-mi, Su-hié, and others, followed the Chinese ambassadors with tribute and had audience with the Son of Heaven, who was thereby highly gratified. (93) Also, a Chinese ambassador traced the source of the Ho River, which had its rise in Yü-tién [Khotan]. The hills there yielded great quantities of jadestone, picked up and brought to China [by the ambassadors]. (94) The Son of Heaven, in accordance with old maps and books, gave the name of K’un-lun to the hill in which the Ho River had its source.

(95) At this time the Emperor often made tours of inspection to the seaside, when he was generally accompanied by numbers of foreign guests, upon whom he would bestow abundant provisions, in order to impress them with the wealth of China. On such occasions crowds of onlookers were attracted by the performances of wrestlers, mummers, and all such wonderful entertainments, and by lavish feasts of wine and meat, by which the foreign guests were made to realize China’s astounding greatness. They were also made to inspect the several granaries, stores, and treasuries, with a view to showing them the greatness of China and to inspiring them with awe. Later on the skill of these jugglers, wrestlers, mummers, and similar performers was further developed, their efficiency was increased from year to year. (96) It was from this period that the coming and going of ambassadors of the foreign countries of the northwest became more and more frequent. (97) The countries west of Yüan [Ferghana], which, being of the opinion that they were too far away from China, had as yet calmly stood upon their national pride, could not be won over by our polite civilization into a state of vassalage. (98) Westward from Wu-sun as far as An-si [Parthia], the Hiung-nu lived nearby, and since they had [once] been a source of trouble to the Yüé-chǐ [Indoscythians], it was still a fact that if an envoy of the Hiung-nu, armed with a letter of the Shan-yü, were sent abroad, all the countries en route would give him safe-conduct and provisions without daring to make trouble of any kind, whereas the ambassadors of China could not obtain provisions without a money payment, nor could they continue their journeys on horseback without buying the necessary beasts. The reason for this was that the people of these countries thought that, China being far off and wealthy, the Chinese must buy what they wished to get; indeed they were more afraid of the Hiung-nu than of the Chinese ambassadors. (99) In the neighborhood of Yüan [Ferghana] wine was made from grapes. Rich people stored ten thousand stones and more of it without its spoiling. (100) The people liked to drink wine, and their horses liked lucerne (mu-su = medicago sativa). The Chinese envoys imported their seeds into China. The Son of Heaven thereupon first planted lucerne and vines on rich tracts of ground, and by the time that he had large numbers of 'heavenly' horses, and when many ambassadors from foreign countries arrived, by the side of Imperial summer palaces and other retreats one might see wide tracts covered with vineyards and lucerne fields.

(101) The people occupying the tracts from Ta-yüan [Ferghana] westward as far as the country of An-si talked different dialects, but their manners and customs being in the main identical, they understood each other. (102) They had deep-set eyes, most of them wore beards, and as shrewd merchants they would haggle about the merest trifles. They placed high value on women, and husbands were guided in their decisions by the advice of their wives. (103) These countries produced no silk and varnish, and they did not know the casting of coins and utensils.⁵ When some deserters from the retinue of a Chinese embassy had settled there as subjects they taught them how to cast weapons and utensils other than those that they already had. Having secured Chinese yellow and white metal [i.e. gold and silver], 6 they used this for making utensils; they did not use it for money. (104) And since Chinese ambassadors became numerous, the young men who had been attached to those missions would generally approach the Son of Heaven with [what seemed] a well worked-out project. (105) Thus they reported: ‘The superior horses found in Ta-yüan are concealed [kept out of sight] in the city of Īr-shī, which is unwilling to give them to the Chinese ambassadors.’ (106) Now, since the Son of Heaven was fond of the horses of Ta-yüan, he was pleased with this report and sent certain strong men [sportsmen, turfmen?], Ch’ō Ling and others, with a thousand pieces of gold and a golden horse in order to ask the king of Ta-yüan for the superior horses in the city of Īr-shī. (107) The Yüan country being overstocked with Chinese produce, the people held counsel among themselves, saying: ‘China is far away from us, and in the Salt Lake [region] numbers of travelers have met with destruction. To the north of it one falls into the hands of Hu [Tartar] robbers; in the south there is dearth of water and vegetation; moreover, they are everywhere cut off from cities without any chance of foraging in many cases. Chinese missions, consisting of merely a few hundred members, have quite commonly lost more than half their staff by starvation. If this be so, how much less could the Chinese send a big army? What harm can they do to us? The horses in Īr-shī are the most precious horses of Yüan.’ (108) And they refused to deliver the horses to the Chinese ambassadors. The latter became very angry and with scathing words smashed the golden horse and returned. (109) The notables, in their turn, were incensed and said: ‘The Chinese ambassadors have treated us with extreme contempt.’ They ordered the envoys out of the country, and caused them to be intercepted at Yü-ch’öng on the eastern frontier, where the ambassadors were killed and robbed of their belongings.

6 Wu Jön-kié, of the 12th century A.D., in his critical work Liang-han-k’an-wu-p’u-i, chap. 8, p. 8 B, quotes K’ungh Ying-ta, one of the authors of the Sui-shu and one of the best-known commentators of the classics, 574-648 A.D., as saying that to the ancients huang-kin, ‘yellow metal,’ and huang-t’ieh, ‘yellow iron,’ were identical with the t’ung, ‘copper,’ of his time. He also thinks that pai-kin means both ‘silver’ and ‘tin,’ the latter yielding bronze in combination with copper.

(110) Upon hearing this the Son of Heaven was very wroth. The ambassadors previously sent to Yüan, namely Yau Ting-han and others, reported: 'The army of Yüan is weak; if we attack it with no more than three thousand Chinese soldiers using crossbows, we shall be sure to vanquish it completely.' The Son of Heaven, having previously sent the Marquis of Tso-yé with seven hundred cavalry to attack Lóu-lan, with the result that the king of that country was captured, approved of the plan suggested by Yau Ting-han and others, and, wishing to bestow a marquisate on his favorite concubine, Madam Li, appointed Li Kuang-li leader of the campaign, with the title Ir-shí tsiang-kün [i.e. General Ir-shí] and ordered him to set out with six thousand cavalry of the feudal states and several hundred thousand men, being recruits selected from the riffraff of the provinces, and to march upon Yüan with the intent of advancing on the city of Ir-shí and taking possession of its superior horses, for which reason he was styled 'General Ir-shí.' Chau Shí-ch'öng was appointed kün-chöng [adjutant-general?], the late Marquis of Hau, Wang K'ui, was sent as a guide to the army, and Li Ch'o was appointed a governor in charge of the army regulations. This happened in the year 104 B.C. (111) And great swarms of locusts arose to the east of the great wall and traveled west as far as Tun-huang. When the army of General Ir-shí had crossed the Salt Lake [Lopnor], the small states on the road were alarmed; they strengthened their city defenses and refused the issue of provisions. Sieges were of no effect. If the cities surrendered, the army would secure provisions; if they did not, it would in the course of a few days retire. When it came to Yü-ch'öng, the Chinese army consisted of not more than a few thousand men, and these were exhausted from lack of food. At the siege of Yü-ch'öng the Chinese troops were utterly routed with great losses in killed and wounded. General Ir-shí with Li Ch'o, Chau Shí-ch'öng, and others reasoned thus: 'If our drive on Yü-ch'öng ended in failure to take the city, how much less can we advance on the king's capital?' Consequently, after a campaign of two years the army was led back. When it reached Tun-huang only one or two out of every ten soldiers were left. (112) The general sent a message to the Emperor in which he said: 'Owing to the distance of the expedition we often were short of provisions and our soldiers were troubled not so much by battles as by starvation; their numbers were not sufficient to conquer Yüan.' He proposed for the time being to stop the war and to set out again when better prepared. (113) When the Son of Heaven heard this report he was much incensed and ordered the Yü-mön [Gate] to be closed, saying: 'If any members of the army dare to enter, they shall lose their heads.' Îr-shî was afraid and remained at Tun-huang. (114) That summer [103 B. C.] China had lost more than twenty thousand men of Tso-yé's army against the Hiung-nu. The dukes, ministers, and councils called upon to deliberate all wished to give up the expedition against the army of Yüan and to direct special efforts to attacking the Tartars. (115) The Son of Heaven [thought that] having sent a punitive expedition against Yüan, a small country, without bringing it to terms would cause Ta-hia [Bactria] and the like countries to feel contempt for China, and the superior horses of Yüan would never be forthcoming; also Wu-sun and Lun-t'ou would make light of harassing the Chinese ambassadors, [and China] would thus become the laughing-stock of foreign countries. (116) The Emperor therefore preferred an indictment against Tông Kuang and others who had reported that making war on Yüan was particularly inopportune, [and an army consisting of] ticket-of-leave men and sharpshooters, to whom were added the young riffraff and roughriders of the boundary, was organized within rather more than a year. When it left Tun-huang this army consisted of sixty thousand men, not counting those who followed as carriers of secret supplies of extra provisions; a hundred thousand oxen; more than thirty thousand horses; donkeys, mules, and camels numbering myriads, and a commissariat well stocked with provisions, besides arms and crossbows. All parts of the Empire had to bestir themselves in contributing offerings. (117) In this campaign against Yüan no less than fifty military governors were appointed. In the city of the king of Yüan there were no wells, and the people had to obtain water from a river outside the city, whereupon experts in hydraulics were sent to divert the course of the river, thus depriving the city of water, besides effecting an opening through which the city might be laid open to access. (118) In order to protect Tsiu-ts’üan, an additional contingent of a hundred eighty thousand frontier troops was stationed in the newly established districts of Kū-yen and Hiu-chu in the north of Tsiu-ts’üan and Chang-yé. (119) There were further sent the offenders under the seven clauses of the law on minor offenses from the whole empire, as carriers of provisions for the Īr-shī expedition force; wagoners with their carts went in endless lines to Tun-huang; and in anticipation of the defeat of Yuan, two horse-breakers were appointed as equerries [with the rank of] military governors to handle the superior horses to be selected. (120) Thereupon [General] Īr-shī had to march out again, and since he had now more soldiers, the smaller countries he passed through did not fail to welcome him with provisions for his army. When he came to Lun-t’ōu, however, that city would not submit, so, after a siege of a few days, it was laid in ruins. After this event the march to the west proceeded without impediment as far as the [outskirts of the] city of Yuan. (121) On its arrival there the Chinese army consisted of thirty thousand men. An army of Yuan gave battle, the victory being gained by the efficiency of the Chinese archery; and this caused the Yuan army to take refuge in their bulwarks and mount the city walls. (122) General Īr-shī wished to attack Yü-ch’ōng, but was afraid his detention thereby would allow Yuan to resort to additional stratagems. He therefore went direct to Yuan, cut off the source of its water-supply by diverting the course of the river upon which it depended, and the city was in great straits. Yuan was invested by the Chinese for more than forty days. On battering the outer city wall they captured one of the notables of Yuan, a prominent leader named Tsién-mi.

The people of Yuan became panic-stricken and withdrew into the inner city, where their notables held counsel among themselves, saying: ‘The reason why the Chinese make war on us is that our king, Mu-kua,7 held back the superior horses and killed the Chinese ambassadors. If we now kill our king, Mu-kua, and surrender the superior horses, the Chinese army will raise the siege; on the other hand, if they do not raise the siege

7 According to Ts‘ien-han-shu, chap. 17, p. 14, Mu-ku, which, according to Yen Shü-ku, appears to be similar in sound to the original western name.
there will be war to the death. It is not yet too late.' The notables of Yüan were all of this opinion. They therefore assassinated their king, Mu-kua, and sent his head to General Ir-shí by their notables, saying: 'If the Chinese will cease making war on us, we will let you have all the superior horses you desire and will supply the Chinese army with provisions; but, if you do not accept our terms, we will kill all the superior horses, and help will soon come from K'ang-kü [Soghdiana]. In that case we should keep within the city, while K'ang-kü would keep outside, fighting against the Chinese army, which ought carefully to consider as to the course it will adopt.' In the meantime K'ang-kü kept watch on the Chinese army, and, this being still numerous, did not dare to attack. General Ir-shí consulted with Chau Shí-ch'òng and Li Ch'ö. It was reported that Yüan had recently secured the services of a Chinese [lit. 'a man of Ts'in'] who knew how to bore wells, and that the city was still well supplied with provisions; that the chief malefactor whom they had come to punish, was Mu-kua, whose head had already come to hand; and that, if under the circumstances they did not raise the siege, Ta-yüan would make strenuous efforts to defend the city, while K'ang-kü would lie in wait until the Chinese were worn out, and then come to the rescue of Yüan, which would mean certain defeat to the Chinese army. The officers of the army agreed with these views. (123) Yüan was allowed to make a treaty. They delivered up their superior horses and permitted the Chinese to make a selection from them, besides furnishing great quantities of provisions for the commissariat. The Chinese army took away several dozens [shu-shí, 'several times ten'] of superior horses, besides more than three thousand stallions and mares of inferior quality. (124) They also appointed a notable of Yüan, named Meî-ts'ai, who had formerly treated the Chinese ambassadors well, as king of Yüan, with whose swearing-in the campaign ended. After all, the Chinese were unable to enter the inner city, and, abandoning further action, the army was led back.

(125) When General Ir-shí first started to the west from Tun-huang, the countries en route were unable to furnish provisions, owing to the size of his army. He therefore divided it now into several sections, which took the southern and northern routes respectively. The military governor, Wang Shön-shông, and the former superintendent of the Colonial Office, Hu Ch’ung-kuo, with more than a thousand men, marched by another route to Yü-ch’öng, whose city head refused the issue of provisions to the army. Wang Shön-shöng, though he was two hundred li distant from the main body of the army, reconnoitered, but made light of the situation, while upbraiding the people of Yü-ch’öng. The latter persisted in refusing the issue of provisions and, having ascertained by spies that Wang Shön-shöng’s army was becoming reduced in numbers day by day, they one morning attacked the latter with three thousand men, killed Wang Shön-shöng and the other leaders, and routed his army, of which only a few men escaped with their lives to rejoin General Êr-shëì and the main army. (126) General Êr-shëì now entrusted Special Commissioner of Government Grain Shang-kuan Kié with the investment of Yü-ch’öng, whose king fled to K’ang-kü, pursued thither by Shang-kuan Kié. K’ang-kü had received the news of China’s victory over Ta-yüan and delivered the fugitive king to Shang-kuan Kié, who sent him well bound and guarded by four horsemen to the commander-in-chief. On their way these men said to one another: ‘The king of Yü-ch’öng is China’s bitterest enemy. If we now let him live, he will escape, and then we shall have failed in an important undertaking.’ Although wishing to kill him, none of the four dared to strike the first blow, when a cavalry officer of Shang-kui, named Chau Ti, the youngest among them, drew his sword and cut off the king’s head. He and Shang-kuan Kié with the king’s head then rejoined the commander-in-chief.

(127) When General Êr-shëì set out for the second time, the Son of Heaven had sent ambassadors to call upon Wu-sun to send big forces for a joint attack on Ta-yüan. Wu-sun sent only two thousand men, cavalry, wavering between two courses of action and being unwilling to proceed. (128) When the smaller countries through which General Êr-shëì passed on his return march to the east heard of the defeat of Ta-yüan, they all sent sons and younger brothers [of their kings] to follow the Chinese army in order to be presented to the Son of Heaven and to be offered as hostages to China. (129) In the campaign under General Êr-shëì against Ta-yüan the Kün-chöng [Adjutant General?] Chau Shë-ch’öng’s chief merit had consisted in vigorous fighting; Shang-kuan Kié had distinguished himself by daring to break into the enemy’s lines; Li Ch’ō had acted as adviser in strategical schemes; and when the army passed the Yü-môn Gate there were left of it scarcely more than ten thousand men and a thousand horses. In the second campaign the army had not suffered so much from the scarcity of provisions, nor from losses in battle, as from graft practised by leaders and officers, many of whom filled their pockets without any regard for the welfare of the rank and file, numbers of whom had under these conditions lost their lives. (130) In consideration of the fact that the campaign had to be conducted at a distance of ten thousand lî from home, the Son of Heaven overlooked these offenses and created Li Kuang-li Marquis of Hai-si; further, he gave the title of Marquis of Sin-ch’i to Chau Ti, the horseman who had beheaded the king of Yü-ch’öng; the Kün-ch’öng [Adjutant General?] Chau Shī-ch’öng was honored by being created a kuang-lu-ta-fu [noble of the first grade]; Shang-kuan Kié was made a shau-fu [director in the Imperial Household]; Li Ch’ö was appointed prefect of Shang-tang; three of the officers of the army received ministerial posts; and more than a hundred men received appointments as ministers to the feudal states, or as prefects, or [positions with salaries corresponding to] two thousand stones [of rice]. [Positions yielding incomes corresponding to] one thousand stones, or less, were given to a thousand men each; and all acts of bravery were rewarded by official positions exceeding the expectations of the recipients. Former convicts who had gone with the army received no rewards. Soldiers of the rank and file were presented with gifts of the value of forty thousand kîn [pieces of gold]. (131) Four years were required to finish the entire campaign against Yüan, from its beginning to the second return of the armies.

(132) Rather more than a year after the conquest of Ta-yüan by China, when Meï-ts’ai was invested as king of Ta-yüan, the notables of that country, attributing the reverses of their country to his method of flattering the ambassadors, conspired against Meï-ts’ai, assassinated him, and installed Ch’an-föng, a younger brother of Mu-kua, as king of Yüan. (133) They sent his son as a hostage to China, and China returned a conciliatory mission with presents. (134) China subsequently sent more than ten embassies to the foreign countries west of Ta-yüan, to collect curiosities and at the same time to impress upon such countries the importance of the victory over Ta-yüan and the establishment of a tu-yü [military governor?] at Tsiu-tsüan in the Tun-huang region.\(^8\) (135) Westward from here to the Salt Lake [Lopnor] the road at many points was protected by military stations, and in Lun-t’ou there were several hundred soldiers stationed as farmers, the special commissioners in charge of the farms being required to guard the cultivated land and to store the crops of grain for the use of embassies sent abroad.

(136) Concluding remarks of the historian.—It is said in the Yü-pön-ki\(^9\): ‘The Ho [i. e. the Yellow River] rises in the K’un-lun, the ascent of which occupies more than two thousand five hundred li. [This hill is so high that] the light of sun and moon may be obscured by its shadow. Its summit contains the spring of sweet wine and the pool of jade.’ Now, since by the expedition of Chang K’iên to Ta-hia [Bactria] the source of the Yellow River has been traced, we ask, Where do we see the K’un-lun mentioned in the ‘Life of Yü’? Indeed, the account of the nine Provinces of the Emperor Yü, with their hills and water-courses, as described in the Shu-king, is much nearer the truth. As regards the wonderful tales contained in the ‘Life of Yü’ and the Shan-hai-king, I do not dare to say anything about them.

CHRONOLOGICAL SYNOPSIS

B. C.

165 (according to Klaproth; but doubtful, according to Shiratori, p. 115). Lau-shang, Mau-tun's successor, annihilates the Yuè-chi, kills their king, and makes a drinking-cup out of his skull. The Yuè-chi flee to the west, and first

164 (?) settle down near Lake Issyk-kul, driving out the Sak-wang (Saka princes?), called also Sak-chung (Saka tribes? the character for Sak being modern Sai; see Giles, no. 95410). The Sak-wang, according to Ts'ien-han-shu (chap. 96 A, p. 10 B), migrated south and became rulers in Ki-pin (Kashmir), and the Sak-chung were scattered about and settled in several other states. The scholiast Yen Shih-ku (7th cent. A. D.) identified these Sak-chung with the Shak-chung (Shak = modern shi, the character used in the transcription for Šakya-muni Buddha, Giles, no. 9983) of the Buddhists. My present personal view, which however may ultimately prove quite untenable, is that the Sak princes and the Sak tribes driven away by the Yuè-chi near Lake Issyk-kul may have been an eastern branch of that great Saka family of whom Herodotus (7. 64) says: oî γὰρ Πέρσαι πάντας τῶν Σκύθας καλείοντι Σάκας; in other words, that they were eastern Scyths, the term 'Scyth' being explainable as having originated from an old plural sak-ut, 'the Sakas.' However, this may be all wrong. There was at least one Chinese scholar in the sixth century who held quite different views, though my Chinese friend, Mr. T. Y. Leo, does not regard him highly

10 The Cantonese and, therefore, probable ancient sound of this character is sak, and not sōk, as Franke, p. 47, transcribes it, apparently on the strength of Parker's adoption, in Giles's Dictionary, of Wade's ì (= ò) in lieu of a, in many of his renderings of Cantonese sounds. The character for our sai is correctly described as sak on p. 795 of Eitel-Genähir's Dictionary of the Cantonese Dialect, as well as in William's and all other Cantonese dictionaries.
as an authority; still his theory, of which I distinctly disclaim any indorsement, deserves to be mentioned. Sun Tsi, whose biography has been preserved in Pei-shih (chap. 83, p. 10), offended the religious feelings of Wu-ti of the Liang dynasty (502-549 A.D.) by his criticisms of the Emperor's lavish devotion to Buddhist ceremonial, and fled to the Wei dominions in order to save his head. In his 'Memorial on Buddhism' (Lun-fo-kiau-piau) he discusses the term 'Sak-chung' of the Ts'ien-han-shu. These Sak tribes, he says, were originally the barbarians of the Yun clan (Giles, no. 13,844), who at the time lived in Tun-huang, were driven out by the Yüé-chi, and on their flight came to the south of the Tsung-ling (see Sü Sung's commentary on the Saka passage in the Ts'ien-han-shu).

In tracing this Yun clan back to its origin, as represented in Chinese literature, we have to refer them to those non-Chinese races who, according to legendary tradition, once lived within the dominions of the model emperors Yau and Shun (about the 23d century B.C.) and were banished to the distant border as being unfit to live with the more civilized Chinese. According to the Tso-chuan (9th year of Duke Ch'au = 533 B.C.), the Yun clan is connected with T'au-wu, one of the 'Four Wicked Ones' banished by Shun (cf. Hirth, The Ancient History of China, p. 85 f.). For 'the ancient kings located T'ao-wuh in (one of) the four distant regions to encounter the sprites and other evil things, and so it was that the villains of the surname Yun dwelt in Kwa-chow' (Legge, The Ch'un Ts'ew, with the Tso-chuen, p. 625; cf. also T'ung-tien, chap. 189, p. 3, and Sü Sung's Si-yü-shui-tau-ki, chap. 3, p. 8 B seq.). If this tradition were more than a mere prehistorical legend, we might be led to assume that Sü Sung's commentary considered the Sak tribes expelled by the Yüé-chi near Lake Issyk-kul as belonging to the stock of Tangut or Tibetan nations, rather than to the Scythians of Herodotus.

160 (approximately; see Shiratori, p. 117, and Franke, p. 15). The Wu-sun, formerly under Hiung-nu rule near Kua-chou, move to the west, drive out the Yüé-chi, and occupy their territory near Lake Issyk-kul, shaking off allegiance to the Hiung-nu.
The Story of Chang K’ién

135 (†) Ssĕ-ma Ts’ién born (Chavannes, 1. xxiv).
140 Wu-ti becomes Emperor of China.
138 Chang K’ién leaves China on a mission to the Yüé-ch’ï and is made a prisoner by the Hiung-nu.
128 Chang K’ién escapes, reaches the court of the Yüé-ch’ï via Ta-yüan and K’ang-kü, and spends a year in Ta-hia (Bactria).
127 Chang K’ién returns and, traveling along the northern slope of the Nan-shan, is again detained by the Hiung-nu near Lake Lopnor.
126 Chang K’ién again escapes and arrives in China with a report of his discoveries, acquainting the Chinese of the existence of powerful countries in western Asia, including India, and the alleged source of the Yellow River near Khotan.
123 Chang K’ién created Marquis of Po-wang.
122 Chang K’ién degraded.
121 The young general Ho K’ü-ping defeats the Hiung-nu (see Chavannes, 1. lxvii).
115 Chang K’ién’s mission to Wu-sun, whence he details sub-ambassadors to various countries including India (†).
About a year after his return
114 Chang K’ién dies.
113 Chang K’ién’s sub-ambassadors return to China with natives of Western Asia.
112 War against Yüé (South China). Attempts made to reach India by a direct route.
111-110 Ssĕ-ma Ts’ién’s sojourn in the southwest, where he may have become familiar with the K’un-ming and other tribes.
110 Death of Ssĕ-ma T’an, Ssĕ-ma Ts’ién’s father.
108 Chau Po-nu defeats the hitherto refractory kingdoms of Lóu-lan and Ku-shî.
106 A line of military stations established west of the Great Wall at Yü-mön. The road to Ta-yüan opened to traffic. The Son of Heaven seeks to procure from Ta-yüan the superior horses kept at the city of Îr-shî (Nish, Uranube). The sale of them is refused, and the Chinese ambassador is killed at Yü-ch’öng, east of Ta-yüan.
104 Li Kuang-li appointed leader of a campaign against Ta-yüan to enforce the sale of the Ìr-shî horses.

103 Li Kuang-li, returning without having reached Ta-yüan, is forbidden to enter China and ordered to form a new army at the Great Wall.

102 Li Kuang-li’s second campaign against Ta-yüan.

101 Ta-yüan, defeated, becomes a tributary state of China.

100 Mei-ts’ai superseded as king of Ta-yüan by Mu-kua’s brother, Ch’an-fông. Since after this time the Shi-ki speaks of ‘more than ten embassies’ having been sent to the west (§134), it seems as though a number of years at least elapsed before Ssî-ma Ts’ién ceased to work on it.

98 Ssî-ma Ts’ién disgraced (see Chavannes, 1. xxxvi-xl).

87 Death of Wu-ti, whose posthumous title (Wu-ti) is not used by Ssî-ma Ts’ién. The latter must, therefore, have died (or abandoned work?) before that year (Chavannes, 1. xlv).

HO RIVER, supposed to pass through Lopnor, 23; its imaginary source near Khotan, 93; legendary accounts of Shu-king regarding, confirmed by Chang K'tien's discovery, 136.

HORSES in Ta-yüan (Ferghana), 19; sent as gift to China from Wu-sun, 73, 78; importation of, from the west led to regular caravan trade, 79; classification and nomenclature, 79; a thousand, sent as a marriage gift by Wu-sun, 90; rich men in Wu-sun own four or five thousand, 91; kept at the city of Ir-shi, 105-108; horse-breakers appointed to accompany army against Ta-yüan, 119; two breeds of, being taken away by the victorious Chinese from the capital of Ta-yüan indicates that the more precious animals had been imported there from some other place, 123; see also Ir-shî.

HO-SI (in modern Kan-su), 61.
HOSTAGES to Chinese court, small countries send princes as, with the returning victorious army, 128; son of king of Ta-yüan one of the, 133.

HU, see TARTARS.

HUAN, small country west of Ta-yüan, 92.

HUANG-HO, see Ho River.

HU CH'UNG-KUO, leader in an expedition against Yü-ch'êng, 125.

HUN-SHÖ (thus transcribed on the strength of a tsii-lan scholium in T'ung-kitén-kang-mu, 4, p. 124; = Chavannes' hoën-siô), prince, chief of the western Hiung-nu, tenders his allegiance to China, 61; his territory deserted, 66, 69.

I-CHOU, modern Yün-nan-fu, 80. (This is Marco Polo's Yachi, which name Yule, 3d ed., 2. 67, connects with this I-chou of the Han dynasty. He should have noted, however, that the second syllable chou in all probability did not form part of the aboriginal name, and that the old sound of the first syllable must have been yik.)

I-KING, see 'Book of Changes.'

INDIA, see SHÔN-TU.

INDOSCYPHIANS, see Yüé-chî.

INDUS, river of Shôn-tu, 53.

INTERPRETERS, 54, 73.

IRON, none between Ta-yüan and An-si (?), 103.

İR-SHI. The old sound of these two syllables was most probably either ish or nish. The modern sound of the character for the first syllable, now pronounced 伊朗, is 胡 in five of its combinations with certain radicals according to Chalmers, K'ang-hi, p. 23 f., the best authority as regards the correct description of sounds by the Chinese method, and, since the omission of radicals in ancient texts is by no means unknown (see the examples, to which I may add others referred to by me in JAOS 30. 27), I do not hesitate to look upon nish as a possible equivalent in its ancient sound for modern 伊朗. I am, therefore, inclined to fall in with de Lacouperie’s proposition (Western Origin of the Early Chinese Civilization, pp. 220 and 224; cf. also K. Shiratori, quoted in Dr. T. Fujita’s paper ‘The Castle Kwei-shan in Ta-yuan kuo and the Royal Court of Yüeh shih’ in the Journal of the Japanese Oriental Society, 6. 194 f.) to connect this name Nish with the home of the celebrated Nisean horses of classical lore. Though located by Herodotus on ‘a large plain in Medie territory,’ later classical authors (see Heinrich Stein in a footnote to the Nisean horse passage in his edition of Herodotus, 7. 40) name different localities much farther east. Pliny (6. 113) speaks of ‘regio Nisaeae Parthynes,’ and Stein continues in his footnote: ‘Noch östlicher haftete der Name an den Hochthälern des Murghâb (Margos), dem in Vendid. 1. 26 erwähnten ‘‘Niçâya welches zwischen Mûru (Merv) und Bâkšî (Balkh) liegt’’; während nach einer unsicheren Notiz bei Hesych.V. Νήσαια Ίρραξ und Sud. ἔρραξ ἦσαι jene Pferde in der zwischen Sogdiana und Baktriana gelegenen Landschaft καβάτσεντα (σταρ ἐκάτα βαχές γράφεν γησα) heimisch waren. Ritter, Erdk. 9. 364, findet sie in der turkomannischen Zucht der Atak, die noch heute durch ganz Persien wegen ihrer Grösse, Ausdauer und Schnelligkeit selbst vor der arabischen Race ausgezeichnet ist, und deren edle Zucht wohl zum Teil in einigen Stuterien der Perser-Monarchen in den medischen Hochebenen eingeführt werden konnte.’ Could not this be the Ir-shī of the 羌-khi? It looks almost as if the multiplicity of regions which, like the cities claiming the privilege of being the birthplace of Homer, are named as producers of the best horses the world could boast of at the time, can be easily explained, if we allow some Persian, Parthian, or Soghdian proper name like Nish, Grecianized into نیش, etc., had in the course of centuries grown into a technical term, designating at different periods the chief claimant for horse breeding par excellence. Modern dictionaries furnish what may be almost looked upon as an analogy to this process in the term ‘Tattersall’s,’ once the famous horse-market in London, which has since become a designation of large horse-markets in all countries. It seems that by following up Ritter’s proposition we may be allowed to locate the ‘‘Tattersall’s’’ of the 羌-khi pretty near the city of Ta-yuân, possibly on Ta-yuán territory itself. We may thus arrive at a compromise between de Lacouperie’s view, rejected by Chavannes, and that of Chavannes, who refers us (p. xiv, note) to the Chinese identification, made in the 7th century A. D., when tradition may still have been alive, of the city of 伊朗 with the Osrushna of Buddhist travelers, i. e. the present city of Uratube, about a hundred miles east of Samarkand.
The Story of Chang K’ien

‘JR-SHI, GENERAL,’ title bestowed on Li Kuang-li, q. v. JADESTONE found on hills near Khotan, 23, 93. JAN, hill tribe, 55. JO-SHUI (the ‘weak water,’ δωρό δανείσς, a legendary river or lake, placed by the Chinese near the supposed western terminus of the world), 45. JUGGLERS, in T’iau-chi, 44; of Li-kan brought as tribute by Parthians to China, 92; become popular in China, 95. KAN FU, Chang K’ien’s Tartar (Hiung-nu?) companion, 4; returned with Chang K’ien, 12; given a title, 13; his personality, 15; an excellent Bowman, 15. K’ANG-K’U (Sogdiana), connected by postal roads with Ta-yüan (Ferghana), conveys Chang K’ien to the Yüé-chi, 9; visited by Chang K’ien in person, 17; in the north of Ta-yüan, 22; northwest of, and conterminous with, Ta-yüan, 27; nomads, under political influence of Yüé-chi and Hiung-nu, 27; in the north of Yüé-chi, 29; small, 27, but strong in military, 54; assistant envoy sent to, by Chang K’ien from Wu-sun, 72; an ally of Ta-yüan, 122; Chinese troops advance as far as, when the fugitive king of Yü-ch’öng is delivered to them, 126. TA-TSÖ, 'the Great Marsh' = Palus Maeotis, or Sea of Azov, near the country of the Alans, see AN-TS’AI.

TA-YÜAN, i. e. Great Yüan, in opposition to Siau-yüan, i. e. Little Yüan, a small country east of it and probably named after it. I am now inclined to look upon Yüan as the real name of the country, ta being an epithet placed before it as in the case of Ta-ts’in and Ta-yüé-chí. For, although our chapter is entitled ‘Ta-yüan’ and the country is so styled especially in Chang K’iên’s own report to the emperor, Yüan without the prefix ta is, in our text, often used for it, not merely in combinations as in yüan-ma, 'horses of Yüan,' or yüan kuei-jön, 'the notables of Yüan,’ but also in phrases where it could not well be interpreted as a mere abbreviation, e. g. po yüan, 'to defeat Yüan.' From paragraphs 101 to 103 it would appear that the population of Ta-yüan had many characteristics in common with the nations adjoining it in the west as far as An-si (Parthia). This seems to justify us in looking upon Ta-yüan as a northeastern portion of the former Bactrian empire which, for some reason or other, may have escaped conquest by the Yü-chü. The people grow rice, the cultivation of which must have come to them from India by way of Bactria (Hehn, Kulturpflanzen und Hausthiere, 8th ed., 1911, p. 504 ff.), and store wine from the grape, in which respect they may have adopted the practice of Greek settlers in Bactria. It seems quite possible that the name by which such a semi-Greek population became known to the surrounding Tartar tribes, especially the Hiung-nu or the Wu-sun, from whom Chang K’ien may have obtained his first notice of the country, was Yavan, of which Yüan is a fair linguistic equivalent. For, ‘the Yavanas are the Greeks of the Asiatic dominions and especially the Bactrians, situated just beyond the borders of India.’ Cf. C. C. Torrey, ‘Yavan and Hellas,’ JAOS 25. 304; Dr. Edkins, in his paper ‘What did the ancient Chinese know of the Greeks and Romans?’ J. China Branch, R. A. S., vol. 18, 1883, p. 5; E. Bournouf, JA 10. 233 f.; T. de Lacouperie, Western Origin of Early Chinese Civilization, p. 221.

TA-YUAN (Ferghana), first known through Chang K’ien, 1; reached by Chang K’ien, 7; connected by postal roads with K’ang-kü (Sogdiana), 9; visited by Chang K’ien in person, 17; Chang K’ien’s account of, 18-22; great, rich and civilized like China, 54; assistant envoy sent to, by Chang K’ien from Wu-sun, 72; horses from, stronger than those from Wu-sun, 79; restrained by reputation of Chinese victories near Lake Lopnor, 87; small countries east and west of, 92; best horses of, kept at the city of Ir-shë, 105; not afraid of an attack by the Chinese, 107; refuses to deliver the horses of Ir-shë, 108; first army sent against, fails, 110-113; second campaign decided upon, 114-116; its organization, 117-119; city of the king of, has no wells, 117; Chinese army reaches, 120; battle won by Chinese archers; Ta-yüan army takes refuge in city, 121; water supply cut off and city invested, negotiations for peace resulting in the delivery of horses and the establishment of Chinese supremacy, 122-124; campaign against, occupies four years, 131; kings of, see MU-KUA; MEI-TS’AI; CH’AN-F'ONG.

TA-YUAN AND AN-SI, countries between: language, 101; appearance and character of the people, 102; position of women, 102; have no silk or varnish, 103; taught melting and casting of metals by Chinese, 103.
